A Novel Berkley

My powers are growing. And my dreams are actually memories from lifetimes before. Which doesn't make sense because witches aren't immortal. I'm starting to wonder if I'm something else entirely. I remember more every day, but the answers I need are always just out of reach. While I'm trying to figure this all out, a community of witches has opened their arms to me. I'm dying for a family that accepts me, but how much can I trust them? And those three demons? They're an infuriating (but sexy as hell) pain in my ass. They could also be the only ones with answers to my mother's death. Side note: I think I'm falling for them. 18+ Reverse harem

Puabi is the darkest of the Dark High Witches, those who extend their lives, their vitality, their youth, by stolen power. She has taken many lives to preserve her own. But to live this way demands a price. A rending of the soul. All that's good moves on. She has loved only once, a man who betrayed, humiliated, and abandoned her. A man who didn't care that she'd given birth to his dead son, while he was crossing deserts in search of his lover. Puabi vowed as she buried her child that she would not die until she'd had her vengeance, no matter what it took. But her chance for vengeance has come and gone. Such a disappointment. Her love had left her to burn in a blazing fire. And she did burn, until she threw herself into the sea. But she didn't die. She rode the currents, drowning, reviving, over and over until she found herself being pulled aboard a boat by the arms of a mortal man. She's angry at being saved. She'd been ready to die. Sooner or later, her power would expire. Without another immortal's heart, she would die. It was time. Past time. But it is no accident the ocean's currents carried her to this particular island, to this particular man. Fate has brought her this way. A part of Puabi is missing, the part that can make her whole again. Though he doesn't yet realize it, Matthew is the only one who knows where to find it. And in the process, he, too, will find what he thought he'd lost forever, and mend his broken heart with the power of love.

Witches were bestowed with the power to fulfill dreams, but they had a major defect: They were doomed to die, and most of the time they died terrible, horrible deaths, deaths that could not be avoided. Over time they became obsessed with avoiding their own destiny. With each passing generation this idea grew in the mind of the witches. As time passed, each generation played a part in its cultivation. It was a motivating factor that would drive them to seek a solution. The vampire had something to seek. Beginning with the ancestors they began to realize the chance they may have for eternal life, but it was only an idea, a theory, an out of grasp dream. If there were vampires, what would happen if one could be found, and his eternal life harnessed? Rasia had the passion and the hatred in her heart, the greed that it would take to pursue the answers. Her grandmother had known it; she had counted on it. It had been her sole purpose to spurn on her own granddaughter to carry on her work. This witch girl Rasia would someday become a vampire girl and live forever, she herself would find the bloody 'fountain of youth' that her ancestors had diligently sought. Witch romance coupled with devil worship makes this gripping tale, about a black witch, on her quest for immortality.
