Financial economists often assume that control or ownership shifts from equityholders to debtholders after default or bankruptcy. The change in control or ownership solves ex ante contracting problems and ex post incentive problems. However, the mandatory bankruptcy scheme in the US inhibits a simple change in control or ownership from equityholders to debtholders. Some bankruptcy law scholars suggest that debtors and creditors use secured debt contracts as the next best solution. I provide the first non-anecdotal empirical evidence on relations between secured credit and lender control in Chapter 11 of the US Bankruptcy Code. I find evidence that debtors commit to lender control in Chapter 11 through secured debt contracts. The secured debt contracts leave the debtor dependent on external financing in the event of Chapter 11. Once in bankruptcy and dependent on external financing, the debtor and a Chapter 11 lender negotiate a Chapter 11 financing agreement that includes control rights for the Chapter 11 lender, who is often the pre-bankruptcy secured lender. I find support for hypotheses of relations between lender control to Chapter 11 outcomes. For example, debtors dispose of assets sooner in Chapter 11 in the presence of a controlling lender. Model Rules of Professional Conduct Oxford University Press

Routledge
The Act contains provisions to implement the main recommendation of the review undertaken by Gus O'Donnell ('Financing Britain's future: review of the Revenue Departments', Cm 6163, ISBN 0101616325) published in March 2004. This was to create a new government department integrating the Inland Revenue and HM Customs and Excise and to be called HM Revenue and Customs (HMRC). The Act also establishes a prosecutions office on a statutory basis to undertake all the new department's prosecutions in England and Wales, to be called the Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office (RCPO).
